If you miss one dose, you could become seriously ill. Nursing mothers should take their medications during their last trimester of pregnancy. If you are a nursing mother, you will need to complete a Medication Use Survey for your nursing mother program. If you're having trouble taking your medications as prescribed, there are ways to get relief. There are also various resources for the individual who wants to know more about their medications and the drugs they are taking. Have questions about your medications? Talk with your healthcare providers about ways to solve your problems. They can help you find the right balance between controlling your symptoms and taking the drugs you need to feel well. The following resources will help you get the most out of your medications. The Pregnancy and Infant Drug Study (PIDS) is an independent study funded by the National Institute of Child Health and Development that provides information about medications used to treat, prevent or diagnose health problems in pregnant and postpartum women. Drugs@FDA is the only public database that provides information on drug products available in the United States. Many people have difficulty getting their drugs even though they can afford them. The FDA compiles drug information on prescription and nonprescription drugs and medical devices. There are several ways to access the information online: The National Library of Medicine's DailyMed is a great resource for people with questions about medications. It has information about the purpose of the drug, side effects, benefits and cautions, and includes pictures and links to useful resources, such as the Pregnancy and Infant Drug Study. The National Library of Medicine's Pregnancy and Lactation Drug Information Clearinghouse has a comprehensive list of medications that are safe for breastfeeding mothers.
